

Occasionally I come across a beautiful slab of wood. I found an ambrosia maple slab in Flat Rock. Once the maple tree is cut, the ambrosia beetles tunnel their way out and leave complex hues of gray, orange, and turquoise. Makes for beautiful tables, especially when I leave the live edge. I made the legs out of ordinary lumber, gave them a slight splay for style, and painted them a blue gray color to match the tones of the slab. This one would make a great sofa table or entry table.

43 inches long, 36 inches high, about 18 inches wide (live edge varies). Slab top is about 2" thick.
